The courses “Principles of Management” and “Business Strategy and Business Plans” (formerly one course named “Introduction to Management”) provide the first term students of the Bachelor program in “Management and Economics” (in English) with the basic tools required for running a business. They lean on the textbook by Brickley/Smith/Zimmerman: Managerial Economics and Organizational Architecture. The students apply their theoretical insights to writing business plans which describe the initial of a small enterprise.

“Financial Management” looks at financing decisions from the firm’s view. Typical questions are: Is it better to finance a new project by equity or loans? What are the incentive effects of the capital structure? How to maintain liquidity if this is costly? Sidesteps introduce to (or repeat) concepts from financial mathematics and investment theory such as present value or the CAPM.

Bargaining/Arbitration/Mediation introduces the students to formal theories of negotiations, which are based on basic concepts of cooperative and non-cooperative game theory. Bounded rationality aspects of bargaining, arbitration models, and experimental results on bargaining and mediation provide further insights.

Markets are scarce in Organizations. Hence, the aggregation of individual plans into organizational action can hardly rely on a price mechanism. Collective Decision-Making in Organizations often uses elections and votes, team sessions, authority and power. The course introduces into the relevant game theoretic concepts.

The course Economic Analysis of Law is based on Polinsky: An Introduction to Law and Economics (Boston/Toronto, 1989<sup>2</sup>) and the textbook by Cooter/Ulen. It is intended not only for students of Economics, but also suitable for Law students. They learn how to use simple instruments of Economics (like Game Theory, Consumer Theory, or decision making under risk) for predicting the behavioral consequences of law. Such predictions are necessary for the evaluation of legal reforms.

Economics of International Business uses microeconomic concepts (Nash Bargaining, Nash Equilibrium, Subgame perfect Equilibrium) to analyze international management problems, such as the international trade dilemma, delegation, OEM production, grey imports as a strategic tool, re-imports, entry-deterrence, and the chain store paradox.

The courses International Economics 1+2 are based on the book by Krugman and Obstfeld (Boston et. al., 2003<sup>6</sup>). Part 1 covers international trade (its structure, gains from trade, protectionism, trade policy), amended by my own work on international contract enforcement and regulation of international trade (waste exports). Part 2 focuses on the interaction between exchange rates and interest rates or product markets; subjects like “foreign exchange interventions” and “stability of the global financial system” complete this course. Case studies on the current globalization debate accompany both courses.

The seminar Economic Policy and Ethics analyzes economic behavior from the viewpoint of Economics and Theology. Modern Institutional Economics, e.g., is concerned with the benefit of constitutional self-commitments through contracts, or the emergence of moral rules. The participation of students of Business Administration and of Theology offers an opportunity for interdisciplinary research and discussion. An orientation is provided by the books Horn: Moral und Wirtschaft (Tübingen 1996) und Meckenstock: Wirtschaftsethik (Berlin/New York 1997). In addition, the students receive an article as a starting point for their own research. Each student writes his own paper which is presented and discussed in the seminar.

The course Game Theory for Managers closes a gap between the Microeconomics course on the undergraduate level and the sometimes extremely theoretical presentation of Game Theory during the graduate studies. Students of Business Administration, in particular, get access to Game Theoretic instruments and their theoretical foundations, but learn as well the application of these instruments to practical business problems.

Microeconomics is a mandatory course for students of Business Administration on the undergraduate level. The students receive an introduction into Methodology (positive models, normative arguments, scope and goals of Economic Policy) and into the Principles of Economic Thinking (opportunity costs, scarcity, comparative costs). The book of Hal Varian: Intermediate Microeconomics confronts the students with the basic concepts (Consumer behavior, neoclassical Theory of the Firm, market equilibrium, Monopoly, Oligopoly, Externalities, Game Theory).

The course Property Rights, Transaction Costs, Contract Theory introduces into the basic concepts of “New Institutional Economics”, using the book of Erlei/Leschke/Sauerland (Stuttgart 1999). Close relations to practical business problems are drawn. Further subjects are Constitutional Economics, the Theory of Imperfect Decision-Making and the Economic Analysis of Law.

Managerial Economics was a pilot course for the introduction of a new course program at the University of the Saarland. Students of Business Administration learn how to use the concepts of Economic Theory to solve business problems. Core subjects are Contract Theory and Industrial Organization. In the second part of the course, the students wrote short papers evaluating business case studies. These papers were presented and extensively discussed.
